a good reason, but I think someone should be careful assume that it is a cause that will be friendly to liberalism. One other difference I want to draw, which I think is very important for everyone to think about, and especially for journalists to think about: journalism is not an easy or simple thing. Actually we're all talking about the line between news and entertainment. It's very difficult to think of a news organization that we respect and love that doesn't have a single entertainment scintilla. One thinks of comic poems in this Country, for example. Is that news or entertainment? And likewise, it's hard to think of a news organization that has no clue or commercial footprint about it... You know, the most do. If you concentrate on the press at large, I think it's going to be a healthy thing for the country. It will be a very healthy thing for free, openly, less between political communication and debate in the country. What Arianna talks about with blogs, you can see happening a lot, more, especially on cable television and on the radio, and a little bit in the newspapers too. So, you can have a lot of very wealthy political opinions going on in this country, which as I said, not necessarily all liberals, probably won't be all liberals, can be particularly conservative. Something to think about. There are other boxes that I don't want to set up neatly and call it journalism, but I want to sort of make some eyes careful. If you think of something, just to choose a close example in hand, this week's wonderful New York Times series on rail crossings, which is a real challenge to corporate interests and corporate power, presents a surprising picture I think will make a difference. It's really expensive to do that kind of thing. You have to send a team of reporters and pay them for a long time to do such a project. You may need to have some institutions standing to get a response from powerful ones. That would obviously help if the press had been more aggressive in running the war in Iraq. You may need to have a kind of journalist-trained power, but it certainly is labor-intensive and intensive capital, and it's also great to have the reach that the New York Times has. So, what I'm saying is, don't assume that simply by making a lot of broadband available to voice in the communications media, which will necessarily lead to more types of reporting - that is just one part of journalism, but it's a dear part to the vast majority of our hearts - which we admire. I would suggest in the debate - and this is sort of to close the circle - one reason why I think journalists should this debate, journalists should join this debate as very keen to promote reporting. What kind of structural solutions and regulation is the most friendly to the kind of reporting exercises that not every blogger and radio host can do. And I think I'll just end up with the most uncomfortable truth for journalists, namely: it could be that federal coercion is a matter - especially in the realm of broadcasting - that would be the most friendly to what most of us would think of as good journalism. And I think there used to be better journalism on TV, at least in documentaries, at least on the network, and that's not just because Edward R. Murrow is a wonderful person, but because of federal coercion. One thing is difficult for journalists to think about, but something we should think of. I'll stop there. there.
